Our civilization represses not only "the instincts", not only sexuality, but any form of transcendence. Among one-dimensional men, it is not surprising that someone with an insistent experience of other dimensions, that he cannot entirely deny or forget, will run the risk either of being destroyed by the others, or of betraying what he knows.

Kingsley Hall was the first of Laing's household communities that served as a place where you could live through madness until you could get it together and live independently. It was conceived as an "asylum" from forms of treatment — psychiatric or otherwise — that many were convinced were not helpful, and even contributed to their difficulties.
